He closed his eyes and waited. Hilda was merely fifteen when she fell in love with his father. All that this meant was that she may have been a bit young to be Max's mother, but not too young for his father. Hilda had fallen crazily in love with the dandy Galician, who had passed through Manhattan waiting for a ship to catch a ride back home, and whom she never saw again. He left only his mother's address, as transient lovers sometimes do: 'Drop me a postcard sometime, in case you're ever in my part of the world, baby...'. And she had faithfully and relentlessly dropped postcards and Christmas cards with glitter for snow and pictures of Santa Claus and North American candy canes. During the war, his father said, he received one of the diligent postcards from France and he worried that any day she might appear on his doorstep.

As she grew nearer, Max envied his father to have captured the ardent love of a woman for so long, as well as pitied the woman, who, as far as anyone knew, hadn't been left with a child but had wasted a good life on a man who hardly remembered her except for the persistent one-sided correspondence.

When Hilda reached the third floor, she stopped abruptly. A few moments passed before the hollow sound of her heels continued and just as she turned to go up to the last floor, Max caught the first view of her face. She was dark, and although not very small, she seemed in good shape.
